MONTHLY RETROSPECT OF POLITICS.

THE Continent of Europe again enjoys peace, except at two of its extremities, the Russians and Turks are waging an unequal war, on the shores of the Black Sea and the Danube, while a more unequal contest is still carrying on in the peninsula of Spain, by a portion of that nation against the French. The emperor Alexander, flattered by receiving part of the Austrian spoils, almost without drawing a sword, is now left by Bonaparte to fight his battles against Turkey, while he himself is occupied for a time with affairs of nearer and more immediate concern. The Russians, indeed by themselves, would be fully sufficient to put an end to the Mahometan Government in Europe, but, if we mistake not, Napoleon will protract the period of its entire overthrow, till he shall be able to devote more attention to the arrangements arising from a matter of such considerable importance. He does not affect to conceal his sentiments respecting the Porte: her alliance with England, if continued, will assuredly accelerate her destruction, renunciation of that, and submission, may put off the evil day until a season of leisure, when negotiation will accomplish the work as effectually as an appeal to arms.

The Speech of Bonaparte to the Legislative Body, at the opening of its session, may be considered as the formal public explanation of his sentiments and views, to the nation at large. We have mentioned his reference to Turkey: his opinion of Spain is given in few words, and with little qualification, must be the opinion of every impartial observer; that all appearance of opposition must speedily cease before the immense force that will soon overspread her territory. There has lately been some change made in the formation of the Supreme Junta; an Archbishop has been placed at its head, while the Marquis Romana is supposed to be the spring which regulates its motions. Under this semblance of ecclesiastical authority, a decree, which a few months ago would have been branded as sacrilegious, has been issued, to convert the church plate and some ecclesiastical revenues to the service of the state. This, together with the measure of arming all the inhabitants, and putting the whole means of the country in requisition, as is now rumoured to be done, is too late in being resorted to, as well as the assembling of the Cortes, for the French will occupy the country before there is time for any of them to take effect.
